

Giana Buccino

Client Website Narrative - Imperfect Elegy by Maxwell LaBelle

The landing page of the website would feel a lot like the cover of Max's book, Imperfect Elegy, and then lead the user into the full website. I want the links from the sitemap to become a side bar off to the right that would always be there for the user to access. The photos will be quite large in scale on the page since they are the highlight.

Within "the book" page, I'd like for sections of "one," "two," "three," "four," and "five" to appear underneath the page. These are for the different sequences of the book. An option down to the bottom left would also appear for users to navigate forwards or backwards in the book. They can also toggle between viewing pages, spreads, or all the thumbnails.

As the user navigates through the images of the book, I would like for the numbered sections to serve two functions. Their first function will be to guide the user as they are going through the book. The highlighted section will progress as the user does. Their second function will be for the user to be able to jump from sequence to sequence.

The user can also read Max's artist statement. Because the book is the only work of this site, the statement will solely be about the book. This explains why it is being separated from the "about" page.

Additionally, users can purchase the book. Max has the book uploaded on blurb, so it would not be bought directly from this site. Any purchase button would redirect users to blurb.

Finally, Max would have an about / contact page. This page would include a photo of him and a small biography. It would also include various contact details, such as email and instagram.